Association of International Education Administrators Announces 2020-2021 Presidential Fellows

Durham, NC (September 25, 2020)—The Association of International Education Administrators (AIEA) is pleased to announce that three international education leaders have been selected as 2020-2021 Presidential Fellows. The AIEA Presidential Fellows program is a highly competitive mentoring initiative for senior international officers serving in the first three years of their current positions.

Jeff Cohen of the University of Washington Tacoma, David DeVallance of the University of Primorska, and Annie Phillips of Texas Woman's University were selected by a committee of their peers as recipients of this year's fellowship.

AIEA Presidential Fellows are matched with seasoned mentors to provide advice, consultation, and guidance on internationalization issues tailored to their institutions. Each fellow is awarded a small stipend toward a visit to their mentor's campus (circumstances permitting), during which they will learn about campus policies, politics and procedures; meet administrators and faculty; and immerse themselves in the day-to-day activities of the institution. This program affords participants the opportunity to observe how experienced senior international officers and their institutions address international education challenges and solve problems, to learn about national and international issues and how they affect individual campuses, and to become a member of an international network that can serve as a resource beyond the Presidential Fellows program.

Bringing extensive knowledge and experience to their roles as 2020-2021 Presidential Mentors are Anne M. D'Angelo of the University of Minnesota, Douglas Proctor of University College Dublin, and Jewell Green Winn of Tennessee State University.

"AIEA congratulates these exceptional leaders on their selection as Presidential Fellows," said Darla Deardorff, AIEA Executive Director. "The development and promotion of outstanding leadership in international higher education is at the core of AIEA's mission, and we are thrilled to help support the work of these emerging international officers."
